

The Ploughman.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1876.

Although silver is to be found in the Western world as to become depreciated in value, in China it appears to have gone out of existence almost. Interest in that populous country has gone up to 3 per cent a month, and even at that rate money is to be had only by great difficulty. The market is now in a state of depression throughout the continent.

An ingenuous man, Mr. Conradi Jensen of Detham, has invented the longest-indicator by which the names of the stations on railway roads may be seen by all the passengers before they are reached, one station after another. It has been tested on the London and Birmingham road, and was well received as the invention is wished. It will prove a great blessing to the travelling community, who can now ascertain where they are with out having to catch a fleeting conductor or to try to understand a shunting brakeman through a closed door.

The railway men have held a meeting at a New York hotel, of a secret character, but the arrangements were to be the return of trans-Atlantic and passenger rates on the lines to the West. It is not at all improbable that the rates will soon be advanced at random, in view of the approach of the time for the closing of canal and lake navigation.

It seems to be another time for our church editors. The Charles street Baptist Church, in which the good Dr. Shurtleff was ministered from 1812 to 1832, has called him back. Let us hope that he will be as successful in his second ministry as in his first.

Dr. Hayes, the well-known Arctic Explorer, is out in a very emphatic letter to the New York Tribune, to the effect that the American government is to be blamed for the depression of trade and industry, not only in Germany but throughout the world, and states that the object of the Government's commercial policy will be the protection of German industry from the prejudicial effects of one-sided customs regulations in other countries.

NOVEMBER.

There is a natural resting-spell for the farmer between the harvest and the winter, the month that holds the hunter's-moon and the annual Thanksgiving is just that welcome.

The harvest of the North is over.

The Poet's Corner.

Patriotism.

By J. H. ANTHONY.

To one who loves his country, what can be more pleasing than to gaze upon her free? To see her surfaces Art's extended base, The light and wonder of the human race? To see her sons, just as their forefathers, stand? That man should stand by power of mind; His spirit, like Truth's, dictated, based on Heaven's own plan.

At once the shield and monitor of man; Himself triumphant, mighty, but yet mild.

In a great, though not a bold,

But what on earth has man to behold?

His soul is writhed, and his freedom sold;

Merri commerce ruined, justice but a name,

And swarms of despot gloom over her shape?

I love my country, love her everywhere;

I love her mellow skies, her pure air;

I bold blue mountains, towering far on high;

Her beauteous landscapes, their verdant dye;

Her rivers, her streams, her lakes, her hills;

Her flowers, her meadows and her sunny skies;

Her dark deep forests and her boundless plain;

Her endless rivers, and her stormy matin;

Her stalwart sons, on land, on lake, and sea;

Her stately, strong, and to bright Freedom's cause;

Her hope, to give the world bountiful laws!

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

LOVE IN A GLACIER.

In an Alpine valley, one pleasant summer evening, a couple might have been seen strolling through the pine forest.

Henri went with an aged parent in a narrow valley, while Marie resided with her widowed mother. A small farm in a high entrenchment, from which it was easy to get to the top of the mountain, bulwarks against the falling rocks, and substantial angular fortresses to resist sudden attacks of avalanche, offered shelter to those who had been covered with the debris of the mountain. The produce of this highland farm was not likely to make him a wealthy man. But the courage, industry and tact, with which he held his own from constant conflict, presented him from an elevation of luxury.

Men tended a few cattle, the ramble on the mountain, and not infrequent education, were the only trials of life.

The cold, icy air, which lay at the foot of the mountains; those fierce falls of rocks, that seemed calculated of destruction from the sky; the snow, the ice, the tempests, the yawning precipices, with their dark and fearful depths—all stirred her imagination and fear.

On the evening of our story the young man had paid a visit to the cottage in the valley, and had then strolled forth through the great forest. Marie, the Alpine flower, had no secret, nor attempt to tell the subjects of their conversation. Whatever it may be granted that the amorous and logic formed part of the conversation, there may be said, however, it was there and then agreed that on a certain day, not far removed, the worthy cure of the village should be sent to the mountain.

Henri had resolved to go home by a short route, over the neighboring mountain, though he would have to cross a glacier on the way. This was the most difficult, and the most dangerous, great difficulty in the eyes of the bold and of the Alps, and the moon would give him light across the icy passes.

But the quick approach of darkness failed to notice the march of time. Our young man had so much to say, or what they had to say was so interesting—for repetitions of the story were not out of place—that the evening twilight had long melted into the soft moonlight before the drowsed word farewell was uttered.

When, however, Marie caught sight of the pale face of her lover, she urged the prompt departure of her lover.

Even then he had something else to say, and was so unusually attentive that he could not be wholly indifferent to her thoughts.

He had been remiss in his duty of manners and refined in education, she was not without that sense of propriety which so often distinguishes the Continental peasant, and which can be a sort of ornament to any country.

She might be well educated, but she had been wholly neglected in school, and had been an apt pupil, but a grave sensible woman, had sprang up before her.

Those noble traits, those above the common, those which made her so attractive, those which made her so beautiful, those which made her so charming, those which made her so winsome, those which made her
